Completed work

- Applications for all staff roles changed to be on a “try-out” basis
 - o More information below

Planned work

- Second issue of the IMS Journal is currently being worked on
This is chiefly being managed by the Journal Co-ordinator (koviubi)
This issue will also include a cover design
- To recruit more staff and to make members aware of the Press Sub-Department’s work, the PCo will launch the “IMS Week of Journalism”
More information below
- The Department will continue to focus on the ongoing CIV event to publish works after-the-fact
- Outreach strategy currently on hold

Freedom of Information (FoI) Requests

The department received zero FoI requests in September, and so has fulfilled zero requests.

New way of working for the Department

Due to a significantly low number of people filling in applications since July, we have closed all applications for roles and changed the way members can work for the department.

From now on, until further notice, any member is able to sign up to any role in the #apply channel and try the role out. They will be given the standard mentorship and a three-month probationary period, as usual. If the trial staff would like to continue the role, and the EiC approves them, they may become a full staff member.

However, if they decide the role is not for them, they can leave at any time.

We hope that this new process will lower the entry barrier to working for the IMSPD.

IMS Week of Journalism

To drive recruitment and attention for the Press Sub-Department, it will host a one-week-long event where a news or opinion article is posted, alongside a few thought-provoking questions to encourage discussion.

Each post will also remind members of the new, much easier, way to work for the PubDep.

Please read more information from the #bulletin-board in the main IMS server, or on the front page of the PubDep website.

Afterword

The department is continuing its efforts in editing and compiling the second issue of the IMSJ. I anticipate that this is likely to be finished by the end of October.
